logical Department—the former having been copied from the British Museum collection are quite authentic. In describing the monuments I have as far as practicable classified them according to the year of their erection, inasmuch as the list of contents has been prepared in chronological order. I have divided the book into two parts. In the first part are set forth the monuments of the city and environs of Hyderabad; in the second part, all the monuments of Golconda have been described in one group for the convenience of the tourists.

I am greatly indebted to Sir John Marshall, the Director-General of Archæology in India, for his kind and ready permission to reproduce the blocks of Golconda and Hyderabad inscriptions in my book.
